THE CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION

Scholarly research on subjects relating to Haydarabad State under the Nizams (1724-1948) is hindered due to a lack of bibliographic guidance. Useful bibliographies of periodical and monographic literature on India are generally available, but none deals adequately and separately with the history of modern Haydarabad. In the absence of a bibliography exclusively concerning Haydarabad State, a bulk of monographic and periodical literature remains inaccessible to students, teachers, scholars, or any interested reader. As in the case of other areas of research, lack of adequate bibliographic tools for the history of Haydarabad State has resulted in needless duplication of research. A desire to fill this gap prompted me to take up this project. This bibliography deals with articles and books on all aspects of the history of the Asaf Jahi Haydarabad. However, articles and books relating to the ancient or medieval history of the areas comprising the erstwhile Haydarabad State have been excluded, except in Chapter I. While most articles are from periodical publications, items from festschrifts and other collection of essays are also included. Those articles that were first published in journals and later included in a book form are not listed here. Except for a few entries, all the articles and books are in English. In the case of monographs, the criterion for inclusion was that a book should contain at least one chapter on Haydarabad. Administrative documents, such as departmental reports (issued annually) as well as findings of official commissions, and other state publications have also been included. Unpublished doctoral dissertations and some masters' theses submitted to the universities in Britain, India, Australia, and the United States have been included. Most of the articles and books were personally examined to ensure that they in fact existed and were related to our subject. In this connection no reliance was placed merely on the titles of the articles and books or their inclusion in the various catalogs or indexes. The majority of books and journals were consulted at the India Office Library and Records, London, especially for older works. Other major collections consulted include the library of State Archives of Andhra Pradesh, Asafiya (State Central) Library, Salar Jang Museum Library, and the Osmania University Library, all in Hyderabad. Jawaharlal Nehru

University Library, New Delhi; School of Oriental and African Studies Library of the University of London; the British (formerly Museum) Library, University of Chicago Library; Harvard University Libraries, Cambridge, Mass., as well as numerous smaller academic, public or private libraries, archives, or museums in India and overseas. The list, of course excludes citations gathered by correspondence with individual authors or works extracted through searches in standard bibliographic tools and electronic computer data-bases.

In so far as I have been able to locate, most books about Asaf Jahi Haydarabad published and cited by November 1984 have been included here. As more and more literature is produced in this area of Indian history, it is probable that this bibliography will become dated. Readers looking for more recent articles and monographs will need to consult the latest issues of Guide to Indian Periodical Literature (Social Sciences and Humanities) New Delhi: Indian Documentation Service, 1963- , Index India, Jaipur 1967- , Bibliography of Asian Studies. Ann Arbor, Mich., Index Islamicus, London, 1958- and occasional articles in Itihas, Islamic Culture, Journal of Indian History, and other publications associated with Indian history or Asian studies. Unfortunately there is no single source for monographs on Haydarabad; however Indian Books in Print (irregularly issued) is still a valuable tool.

ARRANGEMENT

The bibliography has been given a broad subject organization. Under each subject, authors are listed alphabetically, and under authors, titles are arranged in an alphabetical order by the first word/element; where the name of the author is not available, the title of the article or monograph is interfiled with other authors. In order to prevent confusion between different formats of publication, the subject organization is subdivided into monographic and periodical literature. Most of the articles and monographs have annotated, except where the subject matter is obvious from the title. A list of the abbreviations of periodicals is also provided. The sample entries given below will help explain the system being used here.

SAMPLE ENTRIES

a. MONOGRAPHS

Fraser, Hastings.[a] 1829-92.[b] Memoir and correspondence of General James Stuart Fraser.[c] London:[d] Whiting,[e] 1885.[f] xvii, 483 p.[g] Rev.[h] a. Name of author. b. Date of birth and death of the author. c. Title. d. Place of Publication.

James S. Fraser, Resident at Haydarabad 1838-52.[i]

EXPLANATION:

e. Publisher. f. Year of Publication. g. Pagination.
h. Review. i. Annotation.

b. ARTICLES

Bawa, Vasant K.[a] Salar Jung and the Nizam's State Railway 1860-1883.[b] IESHR[c] 2[d] (1965)[e] 307-40[f].

EXPLANATION:

a. Author. b. Title of the article. c. Abbreviation the journal; e.g. The Indian Economic and Social History Review. d. Volume number. e. Date/Year.
f. Pagination.

NOTE: It must, however, be remembered that all of the standard bibliographic data elements may not be available in every case, especially with respect to the older books or books privately published. Sometimes the names of the authors are not available; or the place of publication is not given; the publisher's name does not appear anywhere in the book, and the date of publication is nowhere to be found. Reviews are given where available. Transliteration of Indian and Islamic names conform to the style recommended by the Encyclopedia of Islam and the Library of Congress. Thus Haydarabad and not Hyderabad.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

In the compilation of this Bibliography I have benefited from the rigorous criticism of my father Dr. Abunnasr Muhammad Khalidi, formerly of the Department of History, Osmania University. His consistent encouragement has been the major stimulus to this project. I only wish that I will be able to put together a similar book comprising primary sources for the history of medieval and modern Dakan in Persian and Urdu, something he has often urged me to do. On several occasions, useful discussion with Dr. Vasant Kumar Bawa helped clarify issues and lacunae in the Dakani history. I wish to acknowledge the skillful editorial assistance of Usama Khalidi. Other members of my family who have been helpful are Obaidullah & Kawsar Zaid, Amer & Sarwat Khalidi, Urfi & Sarah Arif, and Sultan & Fatima Mohiuddin. For their warm hospitality in London, I cannot adequately thank Habiba & Murtaza Ali Baig. Most of all, I gratefully acknowledge the help of my wife, Nigar Sultana, who despite her job, devoted innumerable hours to this project. Her share in the completion of this project is far more than she realizes. Many authors, librarians, and the staff of various institutions have been generous with their time in answering my queries. I take this opportunity to thank all of them.

Although more than 1700 citations were extracted from nearly 240 periodicals, it would still be inappropriate to claim this compilation as exhaustive. Readers are encouraged to send complete citations of omissions to my attention at the address of the publisher.

HISTORIOGRAPHY OF MODERN HAYDARABAD: AN OVERVIEW

Despite the large size, population and economic resources of the erstwhile state of Haydarabad, there have been few serious studies devoted to any aspect of the region. Two reasons account for this neglect. One is the north Indian bias of most historians of India regardless of their ideological orientations. The other is the negative image of the former princely states held by politicians, scholars and administrators, although Haydarabad did stand apart from other princely states in many respects, one of which was its quiet but persistent opposition to British rule. The neglect of Haydarabad studies stares you in the face when you consider the fact that the former state had done pioneering work in public education and was ahead of, or contemporary with, other parts of India in the process of modernizing governmental institutions.

The state of Haydarabad came into being in the wake of the political fragmentation that occurred throughout India following the death of Awrangzib Alamgir, the last of the great Mughul emperors, in 1707. Virtually independent kingdoms were set up early in the 18th century by Muslim governors and Maratha leaders in western, southern and central India, although many of them maintained nominal allegiance to the Mughul "emperor" in Dihli. Among the most powerful of these Muslim rulers were the Nizams of Haydarabad. The founder of this state was Mir Qamar al-Din Khan better known by his titles Asaf Jah I and Nizam al-Mulk I. Despairing of reforms at the decadent Mughul court in Dihli, Asaf Jah set out for the Dakan to save this province from the encroachment of the Marathas and other refractory chiefs. In 1724, Asaf Jah defeated the last Mughul governor of the Dakan and laid the foundation of the Haydarabad State, presiding over its destiny for well over a quarter century. His death in 1748 resulted in a struggle for power between his sons and a nephew complicated by the involvement of the Marathas, the English, and the French. During several decades of shifting political and military alliances, conflict and war, Haydarabad experienced several territorial truncations and survived unequal treaties to emerge as the largest Indian state at the dawn of the 19th century. The state ceased to exist in 1948 when it was absorbed into the newly independent Indian Union.

On the paucity of historical studies of Haydarabad, one influential British historian says

> "the historian of India is bound by the nature of things to direct his attention primarily to the north, and is able to give only a secondary place to the story of the Deccan and the far south."1

The gross imbalance between the historical studies of the north and those of the south has not been redressed yet. Apparently the attitudes that discouraged scholarly pursuits on this area still persist. Historically, the Indian princely states were held in contempt by the Indian nationalists, communalists, communists, and even the British colonial administrators. They considered the states unworthy of serious scholarly attention for a variety of reasons. The British colonialists regarded the states as breakwaters against the nationalist storm, and as a necessary evil that had be tolerated in order to preserve British rule in India. This attitude was particularly dominant after the "revolt" of 1857. The nationalists viewed the Indian states in equally if not more negative fashion. These states were regarded as an unnecessary evil and seen as strongholds of reaction and as props of the British Raj. This view was articulated by Jawaharlal Nehru in his books and is shared by Marxist historians. The prejudice against the Indian states has persisted even after Independence. As recently as 1980, a prominent historian, S. Gopal, charged that > "the only purpose [of the Indian states] was to serve as supports of the British power..."2

The communalists and the traditionalists view the reign of the Nizams as an extension of the medieval Muslim rule in the rest of India, which allegedly oppressed the Hindu population, destroying temples, forcing religious conversions, excluding the majority from political participation, so on and so forth.

Given these biases, it is not surprising that few scholars have devoted themselves to the study of Indian states even after Independence. The few studies that have been made concentrate on two themes: The relations of the states with the paramount power and the evolution of the people's (or "freedom") movement within these states. None of the historians, from the colonialists to the communalists, ever paid attention to the fact that the Indian states, particularly Haydarabad, were maintaining a continuity with the Indian administrative policies, practices and cultural traditions which had been changed beyond recognition in colonial India. Haydarabad State, whatever its many shortcomings — was the first state to separate the judiciary from the executive. It was also one of the first states to establish a university whose medium of instruction was an Indian language. Indeed, it represented the only institutionalized challenge to Macaulayism in pre-independence India. At least two of its Diwans— Salar Jang I in the 19th century and Akbar Haydari in the 20th — were more than a match for their counterparts in British India. Far from being an uncritical supporter of the British raj, Haydarabad was the leading critic of the concept of paramountcy. No wonder that a viceroy had threatened to deport Salar Jang I, and Lord Reading had similarly warned Nizam Osman Ali Khan of deposition over the demand for the return of the Barar province to Haydarabad.

The communalists/traditionalists have defined and analyzed the conflict between Hindu and Muslim elites in Haydarabad in exclusively religious terms. The fact, however, was that Maratha Brahmans, Kayasthas and the Khatris were prominent in administration; Hindu money-lenders and bankers of Rajasthani or Gujarati origin dominated the financial sphere, and the rural administrative structure remained firmly in the Hindu hands. The Muslims occupied the more visible and the ceremonial symbols of political power and held a dominant position in the army, police and some sections of bureaucracy. However, the more important sources of income were for the most part a Hindu domain. The communalist/traditionalist perspective also ignores two other facts: the multi-religious composition of the main adversaries of the Nizams— the Marathas. Arab mercenaries from Hadramawt in South Arabia and European and Eurasian adventurers were an important and sometimes a crucial part of the Maratha armies. Some of these armies had Pathan gunners as well. Secondly, the communalists have disregarded the relative communal harmony that prevailed in the state, especially at the grass-roots level. It is unfortunate that this parochial tendency in historiography has gone uncorrected several decades after Independence. A glaring example of this tendency is the exclusion of the Nizams and the two Salar Jangs from the Dictionary of National Biography compiled by S.P. Sen.3 Given the fact that some nonentities from Haydarabad are included in this compilation, the exclusion of Salar Jang I and II, for example, seems hardly accidental.

Apart from these prejudiced historians, some scholars have been excessively preoccupied with wars and battles, intrigues or diplomacy. The result is a simple chronological narrative with pages after pages of a tortuous procession of names and dates. Until scholars of Dakani studies take up studies of the interplay of the political, economic, social and cultural forces and influences, and the issues they raised, our understanding of Haydarabad State will remain limited. In the last few years some foreign scholars have done work on aspects of the Dakan history. But given their ethnocentric bias and the necessarily limited understanding of Indian history, their writings have marginal value. The Western scholarship raises an important question which calls for an answer: How can the generalized concepts derived by the social sciences from work in the West be applied to the Indian society? Still Indian historians can learn from these scholars in terms of methodology and comparative approach.

Clearly, then, there is a need for a history of Haydarabad based primarily on documents available in the archives at Haydarabad, Bombay, Madras, Bangalore, New Delhi, Pondicherry and London, supplemented with maximum utilization of published and unpublished documents in Persian, Marathi, French and English (for the 18th centuries) and Urdu, Telugu, and Kannada for the 19th and 20th centuries. Although most Indian authors of history have been untrained historians, they provide a wealth of information not found elsewhere or ignored by colonial historians. These may be supplemented with material available in other languages. When this is done, the historians of Haydarabad would have saved

Haydarabad history from more than two centuries of ravages inflicted upon it by colonial officials, Christian missionaries, nationalist and communalist historians, irresponsible journalists and uninformed native and foreign scholars.

HISTORY OF INDIA AND MEDIEVAL DAKAN

An attempt to understand Haydarabad history obviously calls for sufficient knowledge of the history of India in general and of medieval Dakan in particular. Fortunately we have some well-researched histories in this respect. A perusal of the following works is essential before embarking on the study of modern Haydarabad.

GENERAL HISTORIES OF MODERN HAYDARABAD

Listed here are general works concerning administrative, constitutional, and political histories of the Haydarabad State. A comprehensive history of the Nizams was commissioned by the government of Haydarabad in 1922, but it never materialized. For the last several years, a history of modern Dakan on the model of History of Medieval Deccan, 1295-1724 has been under preparation in Haydarabad.

The Rai Rayans were a Maratha Brahman family which migrated with Asaf Jah to the Dakan. They were employed by the Nizams in the administrative and revenue departments of the state.

GUIDES TO ARCHIVES AND GENERAL REMARKS ON THE HISTORIANS AND HISTORIOGRAPHY

As with the history of any other area, unpublished private or state documents constitute one of the important primary sources of the history of Asaf Jahi Haydarabad. While general guides to the archives in Haydarabad, Bombay, Bangalore, Madras, Pondichery, London, and Paris are available, there is a need for separate guides relating to the Dakan. Until we have a separate guide for the modern Dakan, access to archival papers will remain difficult because documents concerning the Dakan are interspersed with those relating to other regions.

ECONOMIC ASPECT

Although differing in structure and operation, the economic system of the 18th and mid-19th century Dakan evolved from the Mughul model. This system with minor changes was in effect until Salar Jang I's assumption of Diwani in 1853. Bureaucratic and economic modernization undertaken by him drastically changed the system of revenue collection and expenditure, which needs to be investigated thoroughly. Comparative studies relating to the different economic and administrative practices in the Diwani, Jagir, and Samasthanam territories are called for. Works focusing on the region's economy in agricultural, commercial, financial and industrial sectors are also needed. Fortunately, we have an impressive quantity of published and unpublished government documents, departmental reports and findings of commissions which when methodically examined and analyzed, will present a more balanced picture than has been available so far.

Discusses the socio-economic foundation of Hayderabad, regarded as a despotic feudal state, in the early 20th century. Under the land system of the late 19th century both Jagir and Diwani lands were under the control of local masters who exploited the peasants. Neither the introduction of the Patadari system in the early 20th century, which gave landownership to the peasantry through removal of the landlord class, nor protective policies for direct producers in connection with the abolition of the Jagir land system in the 1940s, had any effective impact on the traditional land relationship.

POLITICS AND GOVERNMENT

Eighteenth Century, 1707-1818

The eighteenth century perhaps is the most complex period in Dakani history. Not only are six major contending powers — the Nizams, English, French, Maisur rulers, Mughul emperors, and several factions of the Marathas — are involved, but also several minor principalities who shaped the strategies and policies of these powers. Thus one cannot understand the history of the 18th century Haydarabad State without adequate attention to the history of the other powers involved. As with other areas of the Dakani history, a single connected account comprising the economic and political as well as the socio-cultural history of this period — roughly between 1707-1818 — is absent. The English and French "factory" records are primarily concerned with the affairs of "Carnatic", i.e. coastal Tamilnadu and Andhra, and only secondarily with Haydarabad, and even this only after 1740. Primary source material for the earlier Nizams is to be sought in the archival documents of the Haydarabad State in Persian and of the Maratha daftars in Marathi. English translations of contemporary Persian or Marathi accounts are few.

NINETEENTH CENTURY, 1818-1911

The defeat of Tipu Sultan (1799) and the breakup of the Maratha power (1818) by the British consolidated the colonial power in the provinces surrounding Haydarabad. The year 1818 may be reconked as the beginning of the 19th century in the Dakan, ending in 1911 with the death of Nizam Mahbub Ali Khan. Books from a Haydarabadi perspective for this era are either in Persian or Urdu. The British point of view is given in contemporary English-language publications. Little was written that was critical of British policies and practices towards Haydarabad for the fear of official displeasure. Some of the major issues in the 19th century were: the question of the reduction of the Nizams' troops, payment to the troops raised, trained, and controlled by the British but maintained at Haydarabad's expense, the relations of the Princes with the Paramount Power, and the question of Barar's return to Haydarabad.

Controversy over Salar Jang I's refusal to let the Nizam Mahbub Ali Khan receive the Prince of Wales at Bombay in 1875.

TWENTIETH CENTURY, 1911-48

The growth of English education and increasing political conciousness stimulated writings on the 20th century Haydarabad. While a balanced history of this period is still lacking, there are plenty of books and pamphlets providing contemporary comment on the political situation. The constitutional relations of the Indian States with the Paramount (British) power, popular movements, as well as a scheme for the Federation of India are some of the major themes of the history of this period. The sharp communal polarization in British India in the 1930s and 40s naturally had its impact on Haydarabad. A good deal of literature is devoted to the resulting communal controversy. Books and pamphlets representing the point of view of the Government of India, Hyderabad State Congress, the Andhra Mahasabha, the Communist Party of India, the Hindu Mahasabha, and the Arya Samaj is available in English and other Indian languages, whereas literature representing the perspective of the Nizam's Government and the Majlis-i Ittihad al-Muslimin is almost exclusively in Urdu.

THE BARAR PROBLEM

The Barar, or the cotton-producing, Marathi-speaking northwest province of the Dakan, passed into the control of the Nizams in 1724. In the late 18th century, it was under the influence of the Bhonsla chiefs. After the second Maratha war in 1804, the East India Company restored the province to the Nizams. In 1853 it was "assigned" to the British in lieu of monies "owed" by Haydarabad for the upkeep of the East India Company's army known as the Nizam's (after 1853 as Hyderabad) Contingent. Viceroy Curzon bullied young Nizam Mahbub Ali Khan to lease the province in perpetuity to the British in 1902. Later, Nizam Osman Ali Khan made several unsuccessful attempts for its return. In addition to the published material, there is a large collection of unpublished papers in the National Archives of India and the State Archives of Andhra Pradesh. Little-known are the relevant papers of Sayyid Ali Imam, President of the Nizam's Executive Council, 1919-22, available in the Khuda Bakhsh Oriental Public Library, Patna.

The early Asaf Jahi era was a period of general economic stagnation. Consequently, there was little original architectural activity until the 20th century. Parts of Haydarabad city suffered destruction during the Mughul invasion of Golkonda in 1687. Awrangabad was the seat of the Mughul subahdar of the Dakan, housing the Mughul garrison, mint, and the bureaucracy. Nizam Ali Khan moved the capital to Haydarabad in 1770s. Extensive repairs, restoration, and revitalization were done to the existing palaces and buildings. The Nizams' several establishments, offices, and residences of the Diwan and top members of the bureaucracy, as well as the deories of the nobility were situated in Haydarabad. Some medieval urban centers were lost to the Marathas in the late 18th century; others such as Awrangabad, Bidar, and Gulbarga stagnated, new urban centers did not emerge,except for the British-controlled Sikandarabad. The construction of the spacious Residency (1808) marks the beginning of the European influence, culminating in the construction of (1897) of Falak Numa. It also heralded the expansion of Haydarabad beyound the river Musa. In the 1930s some architectural activity was undertaken, notable examples of which are the buildings of Osmania University and the High Courts of Law. The continued assault of man and nature on historic buildings and other significant monuments remains unabated. Most monuments remain unprotected from vandalism (except for the plaques put up by the Archeological Survey of India that say the monument is protected) There is an urgent need for documentation and photography of these monuments before they totally disappear.

ETHNIC STUDIES

Racially, religiously, and ethnologically, Dakan was not distinct from the neighboring provinces of British India. Thus ethnological studies concerning Dakan have to be conducted in the general conceptual chronological, and spatial framework of India. But certain ethnic communities associated with or participants in the Asaf Jahi politics and government over nearly three centuries deserve special treatment. Listed below is an inventory of relevant works.

EDUCATION

The traditional Indian system of education existed in the State until the reforms of Salar Jang I in 1853. Thereafter an educational system closely patterned after the one found in British India was introduced in the State. Mother tongue of the students was the language of instruction up to the high school level. The establishment of Osmania University (1917) marks the high point of educational advancement in the State. No single volume history of education in Haydarabad has yet been written. Reports of the Education Department and occasional other works are all that is available.

LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE

Only general studies, mostly descriptive and uncritical histories of literature of the various Indian Aryan and Dravidian languages, are available. The changes that occurred in Dakani or proto-Urdu following the Mughul conquest of the region have not been adequately researched. Barring dutiful and scattered references, historiography of Urdu language and literature is almost squarely concerned with parts of North India.

The steady progress Urdu made began after its declaration in 1884 as the language of administration culminated in the establishment of the Urdu-medium Osmania University, in 1917. Of course, works on the linguistic studies focusing on the Dakan must be sought in the languages involved. Dialect differentiation based on regional, caste or religious factors is awaiting scholarly investigation, as also the issues (such as language standardization) raised by the influence of one language on the other.

ARTS AND CRAFTS

Dakani art objects are scattered all over India, Europe, and the United States. An inventory of these objects, including paintings, prints and drawings, photographs, musical instruments, Bidri and Nirmal ware, Warangal carpets and rugs, Awrangabad textiles, Aghabani muslin, Chintz and wall hangings, needs to be compiled from collections in private hands or in public custody. This task must be accompolished before periods or styles are designated or influences determined.

NUMISMATICS

Here are listed books and articles on coins, tokens, and paper money which were current in the Haydarabad State. An overview of the subject is lacking. Most works on this topic are written by enthusiastic collectors rather than by academicians. Scholarly attention is needed towards studies focusing on the weight, value, metalic composition of the coinage, and the role of money in pre- and post- colonial periods, especially the reaction of rural areas to the broadening of the monetized economy.

MILITARY HISTORY

Until 1857, the Nizam's army was organized on the Mughul pattern. It comprised of highly decentralized units lacking a chain of command. When almost all the units of the East India Company's Hyderabad Subsidiary Force and the Hyderabad Contingent stationed in and around Sikandarabad were sent to central India to crush the "sepoy mutiny" in 1857, Salar Jang I began the modernization of the State forces on the British Indian lines. Still, a section of the Mughul army (called the Irregular Forces) survived up until disbandment in 1950. Most English language works pertain to the British forces stationed in Haydarabad, rather than the Haydarabad State Forces. But the account by Muhammad Ashraf serves as a good introduction.
